ABSTRACT

Social and economic outcomes are increasingly being attributed to decision making by agents that are non-rational or utility/profit maximising. Ideas, beliefs or social influences are being accepted as the more stronger motivation, when it comes to making choices and decision. In the Indian context this might be as true if not more, when policies are implemented, demand for new laws are made, hygiene and sanitation decisions are taken by people and institutions. The presentation will discuss results from recently publishes studies that throw light on these aspects of social and individual decision making.
